Recycled paper. When making invitations, you need to use a special kind of paper. But to make it eco-friendly, recycle the papers that you already have. One great place to look for good papers is your child's art project supplies. Another great idea to print your invitations with are calendar pages; use the clean sides. Just cut them to your desired size.

Homemade envelopes from glossy magazines. Another eco-friendly item to go with your recycled paper is your very own homemade envelopes. The materials you need are pretty simple because they consist only of glossy pages off a magazine and glue. You can also create a color theme by choosing pages that have a standout color in it.

Re-usable containers. If you are tired of the old envelope to put the invitation in, you can use empty tin cans and mason jars instead. These give a homey feel especially when you are inviting for an anniversary or baptismal party so collect those empty tin cans of candles, cookies, and others. Don't forget to add trinkets such as beads and colorful stones inside the container for that added flair.

Message in a bottle. If you want a romantic flair to your invitations, especially for occasions like anniversary or wedding, give out your message in a bottle. Roll your invitations made of recycled paper and place it inside the bottle. Put on a stopper on the opening and tie a ribbon around the neck, in the color of the party theme. In addition, it is best to use colored wine bottles than clear ones.

Party hats. When sending invitations for a children's party, don't waste anymore and send out the party hats to your guests then ask them to bring the same hats to be used in the party. Just don't forget to stick a note on the hat with the details of the get-together. Not only do you get to re-use one item with this idea but you get to spend for only one item that serves a dual purpose.
